Roman clothing and fashions

Reference Articles

While the toga was a distinctively Roman garment, it was by no means the only item of clothing available to the Romans. In casual everyday life, a short-sleeved tunic extending to the knees was the standard item of clothing for Roman men and was widely worn by children and slaves as well. The tunics of equestrians and senators also carried the purple stripes, and when they put on their togas, these tunics were worn underneath the toga. If it was raining or cold, the Romans used a large cloak called a lacerna, which could be thrown over the tunic or toga. Another variety of cloak, the paenula, may have been a more close-fitting and waterproofed variant.

Roman women were expected to dress modestly and to be largely covered up by their clothes. As a first layer, they wore a longer version of the tunic that reached down to their ankles and had longer sleeves, but the stereotypical garb of the adult Roman woman was the stola, a full-length dress with multiple folds. Women's clothes were often dyed bright colors and were made of a variety of materials. A related garment derived from the Greeks was the peplos, which was similar to a tunic but had an extra fold of cloth over the upper half of the body. When going out in public, aristocratic women donned an additional covering called the palla, a large, rectangular piece of cloth that could be wrapped around the body in a variety of ways.

What sort of undergarments the Romans wore is uncertain. They may well have worn nothing. In art, gladiators and athletes are sometimes shown wearing a kind of loincloth, and this may have been a variant of a standard undergarment.

Roman Forum, Latin Forum Romanum, most importa Dutton ncient Rome, situated on low ground between the Palatine and Capitoline hills. The Roman Forum was the scene of public meetings, law courts, and gladiatorial combats in republican times and was lined with shops and open-air markets. Under the empire, when it primarily became a centre for religious and secular spectacles and ceremonies, it was the site of many of the city's most imposing temples and monuments.
